Project: The Determinants and Effects of Youth Engagement
AAP Priority Area: Youth Empowerment

Africa's population is the youngest in the world. One in six Africans is between the ages of 15 and 24, and four in ten are currently younger than 15. For many, this represents a "youth bomb," as many young people will find it harder and harder to access to economic, educational, and political opportunities. A disenfranchised and disenchanted generation could become apathetic and disengaged, and even vulnerable to sectarian and extremist movements.

These concerns are exacerbated by the fact that, in many African countries, civic spaces have started shrinking considerably in recent years, as governments place new limitations on civil society actors, traditional and new media, and general freedoms of expression and association. Many of these changes are instituted ostensibly to limit foreign influence and encourage stability, but they are significant challenges to accountable government, informed policy-making, and anti-corruption efforts. Youth are often already marginalized; these changes are likely to frustrate their ambitions for economic advancement and political voice even more.

On the other hand, youth could provide tremendous opportunities for economic growth and vibrant citizenship, particularly as younger generations in Africa comprise the best-educated and most-technologically savvy elements of their societies. Social and digital media, for example, which are more often accessed by youth, present new opportunities to share information, innovate economically, and enhance transparency in ways that hold politicians accountable. As Dayo Olopade writes, African youth hold the potential to engage in "risk tasking and rejection of conventional pedagogy" in ways that can positively transform the continent's political and economic systems.¹

Increasing opportunities for youth—and harnessing their civic potential—is therefore a crucial component of building better governance in Africa. Realizing this, local organizations are devoting considerable resources to youth-oriented programs involving civic education, capacity-building exercises, and development of virtual civic spaces that can enable information sharing and collective action. Engaged youth have the potential to agitate for more-inclusive policy-making, improve service delivery, and combat corruption, both in terms of how resources are allocated and how democratic institutions function.

Research Themes

This research program will evaluate the effectiveness of various initiatives to enhance youth engagement in Africa.² More specifically, it will focus on three areas:

¹ The Bright Continent: Breaking Rules and Making Change in Modern Africa (Houghton Mifflin Harcourt, 2014), p. 215.

² Although the project will likely be focused on the East African countries of Kenya, Tanzania, and Uganda, youth-engagement initiatives are relevant throughout the continent, and perspectives from researchers from outside of these countries would certainly be welcomed.

- [1] Promoting good governance, by combatting corruption and improving accountability. Youth often disengage from politics, due to cynicism about an inability to effect change in the face of corrupt, entrenched interests. However, youth-oriented—and youth-led—initiatives at local and national levels have the potential to transform governance, often by harnessing new technologies that foster transparency, information-sharing, and citizen-to-citizen and citizen-to-representative communication.
- [2] Building sustainable tolerance in diverse communities. Under-employed and generally disaffected youth are too often vulnerable to messages that scapegoat and denigrate “others,” thus fueling potential inter-group discrimination and conflict. Thus, reaching these groups with counter-messages, promoting the potential benefits of inter-group cooperation and teaching strategies of active bystandership, is essential.
- [3] Supporting informed engagement. The global interest in the role of social and traditional media in propagating misinformation also applies in East Africa. The governments of Kenya, Tanzania, and Uganda have all responded to this apparent problem by putting in place or proposing laws and regulations that significantly limit speech and press freedoms. However, a number of organizations are seeking to combat “fake news” by training youth to recognize factually incorrect messaging and verify messages before sending them.

Collaborative Activities

An early career scholar would participate in a number of research-related activities on these themes. These specific activities would be partly determined by the early career scholar’s goals and specific interests, and partly determined by opportunities for partnerships with donors and civil society organizations on the continent.

- [1] Development of theories and testable hypotheses on the determinants of youth engagement in different contexts in Africa, and the potential effects of various kinds of engagement on the focus areas.
- [2] Development of grant applications for submission to funding agencies to support partnerships between academics at AAP consortium institutions and practitioners, to study the effects of youth engagement on the focus areas.
- [3] Designing strategies for analyzing and collecting various kinds of data—qualitative and quantitative, experimental and observational—to test hypotheses. Data sources include those collected by Dr. Conroy-Krutz from recent and ongoing projects (e.g., in Burundi, DR Congo, Mali, Niger, Rwanda, and Uganda) and third parties (e.g., the Afrobarometer and surveys conducted by other researchers before and after experimental interventions). In addition, depending on funding and other partnership possibilities, there may be opportunities to collaborate on the collection of original qualitative and/or quantitative data.
- [4] Writing and disseminating results, in venues such as workshops, conference presentations, policy papers, blog and media posts, and academic journals.

These activities would constitute meaningful opportunities for early career scholars to gain increased experience in important aspects of researchers' regular work, including developing theories, seeking funding, designing and conducting data collection, analyzing observational and/or experimental data, and presenting findings.

Finally, Dr. Conroy-Krutz is submitting an application to support the initial stages of this research through the AAP's Transforming Institutions Strategic Funding Proposal Exploratory Grant. That grant would fund a workshop in Nairobi in July 2019 to begin discussions between academics and civil society organizations working on these issues in Kenya, Tanzania, and Uganda. These discussions would, in turn, be used to inform proposals to potential donors. If logistics allowed, an early career researcher working on this project would have the opportunity to participate in that workshop, as a way to launch collaborative activities.
